

Come and research the changing world of work and working lives with us

Professional Doctorate (Researching Work)

The Dprof is everything I hoped it would be. The programme is thoughtfully put together, yet flexibly managed, by a tutorial team that is both demanding and alert to what research students want and need from their involvement. working as part of a group lightens the load, and opportunities to work together have been enjoyable and instructive. There is a mutual encouragement that is worth its weight in gold.

Current DProf Student

A top-rated UK research team, the Working Lives Research Institute in the Faculty of Applied Social Sciences at London Metropolitan University, is again recruiting to its unique post-graduate Professional Doctorate programme beginning October 2011. Studied part time, this taught programme encourages you to reflect and draw on your own professional experience to research the changing phenomena of work, working lives and work organisation at local and international levels. In addition to developing your own theoretical approaches, you will acquire a broad range of practical and transferable skills and pursue doctoral level research into an area of interest related to your own professional area of work.

Modules include:

- Contemporary Work: An Overview
- Work and Globalisation
- Social Action and Organisation
- The Meaning of Work
- Applying Research in Work

The Professional Doctorate (Dprof) will particularly appeal to those active in the trade union and labour movements as well as in the community, non-governmental or voluntary sectors however, we welcome all applications including those from outside the UK. You would normally have completed an MA, but candidates with relevant experience or professional qualifications will be considered.

In joining us you will be working within a vibrant research community that provides you with full support and delivers a flexible programme that fits around your own working life.

For more information please visit our website www.workinglives.org or email workinglives@londonmet.ac.uk or telephone 020 7320 3042.

Vibrant learning in an active research community